A trigger is a mechanism for inserting an action code (a stored procedure or a trigger. The trigger appears in the inserted rowset and is used to execute a specific action. Triggers are defined in a database and an action does not have to be invoked by a person.Q: Will space permit a booster rocket in a planetary orbit around a stellar orbiting galaxy around a spiral galaxy in a chain galaxy around a cluster galaxy in the M81 galaxy cluster? I'm not sure this question is on-topic, but I was wondering if it's possible to put a booster rocket in orbit around a planet in a spiral galaxy around a stellar galaxy around a galaxy in a chain galaxy around a cluster galaxy in a chain galaxy in a cluster galaxy in a spiral galaxy? A: A star in a cluster is of a few parsecs diameter, a cluster has 200-300 thousand stars, so it's certainly within reach if you really wanted to do it. But of course it's highly improbable because you would need to have the booster able to sustain 8.3 people for the entire drive. There's no centrifugal force on a booster, it just always goes to the same point. So if you have a bunch of boosters starting out at random points, you're much more likely to just have all of them break off and leave you with zero boosters. And if it does happen that you get some boosters end up in orbit around the planet, they'll be caught in the gravitational pull of the star instead of the planet and just go around the star, getting slower and slower until the star swallows them, or they explode. A: Yes and no. Because you have to imagine that you would be going from galaxy to galaxy in sequence, there is not much need to bother with an "inter-galactic" perspective of any kind. Because you are just going to orbit one planet after another,
